Freedom rests on the realization that we exists and from here we create the meaning of our life. And this is the characteristic of human freedom, one which proceeds from his nature as being conscious of his own being, as a "for-itself." The "being-for-itself" refers exclusively to the human person.

The Human Person and Freedom - PHILO-notes

Discussions about freedom and liberty – as well as the important distinction between negative and positive liberties, which form the bedrock of the U.S. Constitution and Bill of Rights – have become quite quaint, as people use these words in Orwellian fashion to justify a litany of government intrusions in our lives. When we let their meanings become obscured, we cede to those whose ...
