Most melodies are based on a major or minor scale that correlates with the key of the song. Say your melody comprises the notes in a C major scale (C—D—E—F—G—A—B); each one of those notes is the tonic, or root note, of its own chord. These chords are called diatonic chords, and they play an integral part in assigning chords to a melodic note. This may seem a bit confusing, but the diagram below can shed a little light on this concept.

More complex chords invite more complex melody with more use of dissonance. But even here, any dissonance is handled with care. For instance, the A as the melody approaches the B 7 chord is placed on the “ and of 4 ” , one of the weakest beats in the measure. And, of course, it resolves by half step to a note in the B 7 chord.
